Dr. Herzfeld will trace the unlikely but well-documented connections between Greece and Thailand since before either was constituted a modern nation-state and describe the parallel trajectories whereby both shaped their identities in response to demands of Western colonial powers. He will further argue that the Greece-Thailand comparison, which is less far-fetched than might at first appear, can serve to clarify the specific differences that animate current events in the two countries.